I didn't see any particular questions to answer, but this was an interesting exercise. In a previous course I actually did an implementation of Dijkstra's algorithm for finding the shortest path between two points. Comparing the two algorithms, I found that BFS is an unweighted algorithm, meaning that each path from node to node is considered to be of equal weight. Dijkstra's algorithm is a weighted algorithm taking into account the distance or weight of each connection.